Boating for Beginners is a novel by Jeanette Winterson which belongs to post-modern literature and can be defined as a re-writing of the Bible. In her text, she uses a literary device called intertextuality in order to make comments on what she thinks is wrong in our modern society and for what reason. Intertextuality is one of the five transtextual relation types given by Genette.

How does "Boating for Beginners" (Jeanette Winterson) use ...

Over the last thirty years, Jeanette Winterson has worked across the genres of film, essay, novel, children's literature, short story, 'comic' (as Winterson herself describes Boating for Beginners (1985)), even self-help guide: Fit for the Future (1986). However, it is the formal indeterminacy and genre-bending of her individual works, for which Winterson is perhaps best known.

Jeanette Winterson - Literature

Bursting with ideas, Boating for Beginners rewrites religion and philosophy, while taking a pop at romantic fiction. It is perhaps Jeanette Winterson's most overlooked work and although not her best--turn to Oranges are Not the Only Fruit or Sexing the Cherry for that-- Boating for Beginners is witty, playful and imaginative.
